SECURITY SERIES

SUPERVISOR EXCELLENCE: THE SERIES

This new training program is aimed at improving the leadership skills and operational practices of both new and veteran security supervisors. This new series comprises quality curriculum covering vital skill-building topics like leadership, communication, customer service and prioritization, as well as sound rules and procedures for reducing business risk, preparing for emergencies, managing crises, communicating sexual harassment laws and investigation methods, and developing world-class professional standards.

LEADERSHIP PRINCIPLES

True leadership requires dedication, focus, and flexibility. Leadership is harder than supervision and more personal than management. Supervision is temporary in nature, while true leadership is permanent. Poor leadership comes and goes but strong leaders and their effect on our lives last a lifetime. This course outlines and discusses what constitutes a security leader and provides guidelines on how security supervisors can become security leaders. The viewer will also learn specific leadership principles, traits, and responsibilities as well as the various levels for effective discipline.

SUPERVISOR COMMUNICATIONS

The security supervisor, you are first, last and always a communicator. The ability to communicate clearly and concisely is the single most important skill that a security supervisor can possess. Without communication, there is no coordination; without coordination, there is no organization. Coordinating and organizing are two functions that form the essence of supervision. Communication is the glue that holds the whole process together.

SECURITY'S IN REDUCING BUSINESS RISK

Many security professionals have seen young and slightly idealistic security officers view their role as black and white. These officers, while perhaps well intentioned, believe their primary job is to “get the bad guys” and put them in jail or to facilitate termination of employees who violate company policy. What these officers seem to miss or ignore is that their role is not to get “the bad guys” but to REDUCE BUSINESS RISK.

HANDLING MULTIPLE PRIORITIES

Increasingly in today's workforce, one person is responsible for a variety of tasks. With all this information, how much can one person be expected to absorb? How do you decide what should be done first? How do you avoid becoming frustrated with the overload? This course provides the security supervisor with methods and procedures that will help bring order to the average, hectic day by dissecting the three basic

EMERGENCY AND CRISIS MANAGEMENT

Emergency preparedness can be called many different things: Emergency Management, Disaster Recovery, or Business Continuity Planning. Regardless of the terms used, security plays a KEY role in preparing any organization for an emergency. Supervisors and management should understand the role of security by understanding the basic concepts of emergency preparedness because emergency preparedness is key to business survival. This course provides the strategic steps for emergency preparedness.

CUSTOMER SERVICE AS A SECURITY

When we provide security to our clients, we are providing them with a service. As such, we want that service to be perceived as ideal, tailored to our clients, and designed to fit their needs. Ideal service does not simply occur; we must have a strategy in place that will allow us the flexibility to blend what we do as a security provider into excellent service for each client. This course reviews service expectations, examines the unique characteristics of security service and explains the attributes a client.

PROFESSIONAL STANDARDS

Security has not always been considered a “profession.” While perhaps viewed as a steady job, security was not seen as having a clear career path. However, changes in corporate America, increased terrorist activity, greater liability and increased regulatory requirements have driven the push toward PROFESSIONALISM in the security industry. But before the security supervisor can fully understand what it means to be a professional, he or she must first understand the STANDARDS of security professionalism.
